representative regions of the 5' flanking sequences of the pheromone genes. These will include the FUS3 transcriptional regulatory element, as well as the putative cis-acting sequences involved in translational regulation and mRNA stability. The nucleotide sequences of these elements will be determined. This will be followed by characterization of the RNA polymerase II holoenzyme complexes present on the pheromone genes. These complexes will be characterized as to their composition and nucleotide sequences of the bound RNA polymerase II. These studies will allow us to identify the cis-acting sequences involved in translational regulation and mRNA stability. We will also determine if the proteins bound to these cis-acting sequences are involved in mRNA stability and translational regulation.

In order to identify functionally significant cis-acting elements in the 3' flanking sequences of these genes, we will isolate pheromone genes flanking transgenes, allow selection of mutants, and identify the corresponding genes using high-stringency screening techniques. We will develop a genetic selection system using such genes for pheromone structural genes, and screen for new yeast mutants with unique phenotypes. A P-40 and a P-38 fighter take off from the USS Enterprise. William Stengel/U.S. Navy Article 370 of the UCMJ allows for a sentence of five years of confinement with or without hard labor for a person who “maliciously and wantonly attacks or destroys the property of another.” This offense is commonly known as “malicious damage to property.” It is an offense against the title to property — a person can’t damage
